Excerpt: ... other negotiation, they were friendly and easy, Tejected the overture in such a manner, as manifested their disapprobation. On the 4th of August, the boats weighed, and began to measure back their course to the ships. The wind being contrary and high, they took shelter for some hours in a cove under the south shore. That night the Californias boat lost a man; who was unfortunately knocked overboard by the sudden misting of the mainsail. On the 6th, they repassed the fall, and next day reached the ships. A council was immediately held to receive the report, and Mr. Thompson, the surgeon, intimating the possibility of a passage towards the north shore, which the wind and weather had prevented them from approaching sufficiently near, in the late expedition; it was agreed that another attempt should be made, and that no probable communication should be left unexplored. Accordingly, Captain Ellis, attended by the surgeon, and a few more, set out in the Resolution, to obtain satisfaction on this point. In their passage they law many whales and seals; but soon sound themselves embayed by the coast and islands, and were convinced that no navigable opening existed. Again frustrated in their expectations, they returned to the ships, after no more than one days absence. On the 15th of August, they left Douglas Harbour; and in the Narrows, entering the Wager, were detained by a flood tide for several hours. On the 17th, being in the Welcome, near Low Breach, it was proposed to go thither and try the tide. Accordingly, Captain Jillis and and the chief mate, with some hands, set out in a boat for that purpose; but the time of high water being past before they could reach the shore, and darkness setting in, it was necessary to wait the return of the tide, to execute the comm...
