

Trevlyn Hold; A Novel

Excerpt: ... only fair you should know of it. Fair! In Mr. Chattaways frame of mind, he could scarcely tell what was fair and what was not fair. The interview was prolonged, but it brought forth no satisfactory conclusion. Perhaps none could be expected. Mr. Peterby took his departure, impressed with the conviction that the present owner of Trevlyn Hold would retain possession to the end, contesting it inch by inch; and as he walked down the avenue he asked himself whether he had not been induced to enter upon a foolish errand, in coming to suggest that it should be voluntarily resigned. The master of Trevlyn Hold watched him away, and then opened the breakfast-room door. Wheres Rupert? he inquired, not seeing Rupert there. Rupert? answered Mrs. Chattaway, looking up. I think he has gone to Blackstone. He wished me good morning; and I saw him walk down the avenue. All things seemed to be against Mr. Chattaway. Here was Rupert out of sight now; it was hard to say where he might have gone, or what mischief he might be up to. As he turned from the door, Cris Chattaways horse
